I am Filipino-Japanese and have moved repeatedly throughout my life. In both cultures, cicadas act as clocks: they announce seasons, an hour of day, and the particular trees and heat of a place.

I recorded Platypleura fulvigera outside my former home near Diliman in 2016, knowing that the recording would later become an archive of a place I'd left. Diliman remains one of Metro Manila's greener areas. Where I live now, I no longer hear cicadas in the same way. I mapped the individual attacks of the cicada calls, and used them to trigger sound grains from my multilingual Ilonggo, Japanese, and English poem. The swarm mediates the voice, like it speaks through me, or me through it.

alas ocho na — it is eight o'clock 夏です — it is summer
dandansoy, bayaan ta ikaw — Dandansoy, I will leave you *1*年 — one year
it's 8 o'clock
summer na naman — it is summer again

The sung third line quotes "Dandansoy," a traditional Ilonggo folk song about leaving. Folded into the cicada chorus, this song of departure becomes part of an interspecies voice through which I revisit place and time.
